

Governing Beyond Local Boundaries in the Imagined Metropolis

John Bob and Jane Doe

In the face of increasing urbanization and globalization, cities and regions are increasingly interconnected and interdependent. This has led to a growing recognition of the need for cooperation and collaboration beyond local boundaries. In this book, we explore the ways in which cities and regions are governed beyond local boundaries, and the implications of this for urban governance and policy-making.

We draw on a range of case studies from around the world to examine how different forms of inter-local collaboration and governance are emerging, and how these are shaping the ways in which cities and regions are planned, developed, and governed. We argue that the traditional model of local government is no longer adequate to address the challenges of the 21st century, and that new forms of governance are needed that can operate across multiple scales and jurisdictions.

Reviews

"This book is a major contribution to the study of urban governance. It provides a comprehensive and insightful analysis of the ways in which cities and regions are governed beyond local boundaries. The case studies are particularly valuable, as they provide concrete examples of how inter-local collaboration and governance are shaping the ways in which cities and regions are planned, developed, and governed."

- Professor John Smith, University of California, Berkeley

"This book is a must-read for anyone interested in the future of urban governance. It provides a clear and concise overview of the challenges and opportunities of governing beyond local boundaries, and offers a number of innovative solutions to these challenges."

- Dr. Jane Doe, World Bank
