Parental movements have become increasingly prominent in Central Eastern Europe and Russia in recent years. These movements have mobilised parents to advocate for their children's rights and interests in a variety of areas, including education, family policy, and healthcare. While these movements share some common goals, they have also developed in different ways, reflecting the specific political and social contexts in which they operate.

This book provides a comprehensive analysis of the rise and impact of parental movements in Central Eastern Europe and Russia. It draws on a wide range of research, including interviews with parents, activists, and policymakers, as well as analysis of policy documents and media coverage. The book offers a unique comparative perspective, examining the similarities and differences between parental movements in different countries and regions.

The book is divided into three parts. The first part provides an overview of the theoretical and conceptual frameworks used to understand parental movements. The second part examines the historical development of parental movements in Central Eastern Europe and Russia, focusing on the factors that have contributed to their rise. The third part analyses the impact of parental movements on policy and practice, exploring the ways in which they have influenced education, family policy, and healthcare.

This book is an essential resource for anyone interested in the role of parental movements in shaping social policy in Central Eastern Europe and Russia. It provides a comprehensive and critical analysis of these movements, drawing on a wide range of research and offering a unique comparative perspective.
