2. Encourage your students to write a story in which the main character hides their feelings, only to reveal them in a surprising way later in the piece.
3. Tell your students to incorporate a new character into the story who will change the way the existing characters interact with one another.
4. Have your students write a story in which the characters overcome the first conflict, only to have another challenge thrown their way that the reader does not expect.
5. Tell your students to give one of their characters an unexpected superpower that changes their ability to control the story.
